Dramatic headlands, great views and an abundance of wildlife make this a walk to remember

Look out for: Strumble Head Lighthouse, views from Garn Fawr, Garn Fechan hillfort.

Made of hard, igneous rock, the headland is wild with precipitous cliffs up to 140m high in places so expect great views - reputedly, you can see Ireland on a clear day. Look out for schools of porpoise and bottle-nosed dolphin in the bay - even sunfish and basking shark have been seen occasionally. The shore with its rocky coves and caves is a haven for grey seals.

A variety of habitats exist around the headland such as maritime heath, with bracken, heather and coarse grass, and early purple orchids and cowslip can be found in marshy areas at the tops of the cliffs. The cliffs also support maritime lichens, bluebells and gorse where there’s shelter from the wind. Such a rich flora means that there are many butterflies like graylings and small blues. Welsh Mountain ponies graze the heath - a traditional land management method reintroduced in a partnership project between the Park authorities and farmers.

See the lighthouse on Ynys Michael and watch sea birds from the Second World War look out post the cliffs are home to gulls, ravens, choughs and peregrines. Inland, Garn Fawr has the remains one of the finest Iron Age stone forts in Britain there are good views of the coast south from this natural vantage point.
